Finds Russian Likes Freedom

Allen Dulles Predicts End of Communist Dictatorships

NEW YORK (AP)—Allen W. Dulles, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, predicted yesterday that the "normal love of freedom" of the average Russian eventually will abolish Communist dictatorships.

The nation's chief intelligence officer did not estimate the life span of Communist domination behind the Iron Curtain. But he said his work has convinced him there is no reason to believe that the desire for individual freedom is dying under years of Red rule.

Summarizing his conclusions in a copyrighted article in Parade magazine, Dulles said Americans tend either to overrate or underestimate their enemies in the cold war. The Russians, he said, are neither "supermen" nor are they people with "second-class brains," but are somewhere between.

The Soviet Union, he said, has its share of "stresses and strains" including admitted agricultural difficulties, an acute shortage of consumer goods and growing dissatisfaction among satellite nations.

As factors of possible advantage to Russia, Dulles listed their concentration on producing guns instead of butter, their proved efficiency in science and technology and their emphasis on getting the ablest young persons into scientific work.

But Dulles belittled the theory that a new generation of Communist Russians is growing up with no love of freedom. He said that the experience of his agency with persons seeking asylum in the West has tended to prove just the reverse.
